

Just a disarmament junk pile. More than a hundred of the gallant little destroyers, most of them with a star on their funnels, indicating that they accounted for at least one submarine during the war—all awaiting the uncertain fate which the disarmament plans hold for them. They are anchored at the League Island Navy Yard, Philadelphia, Pa.

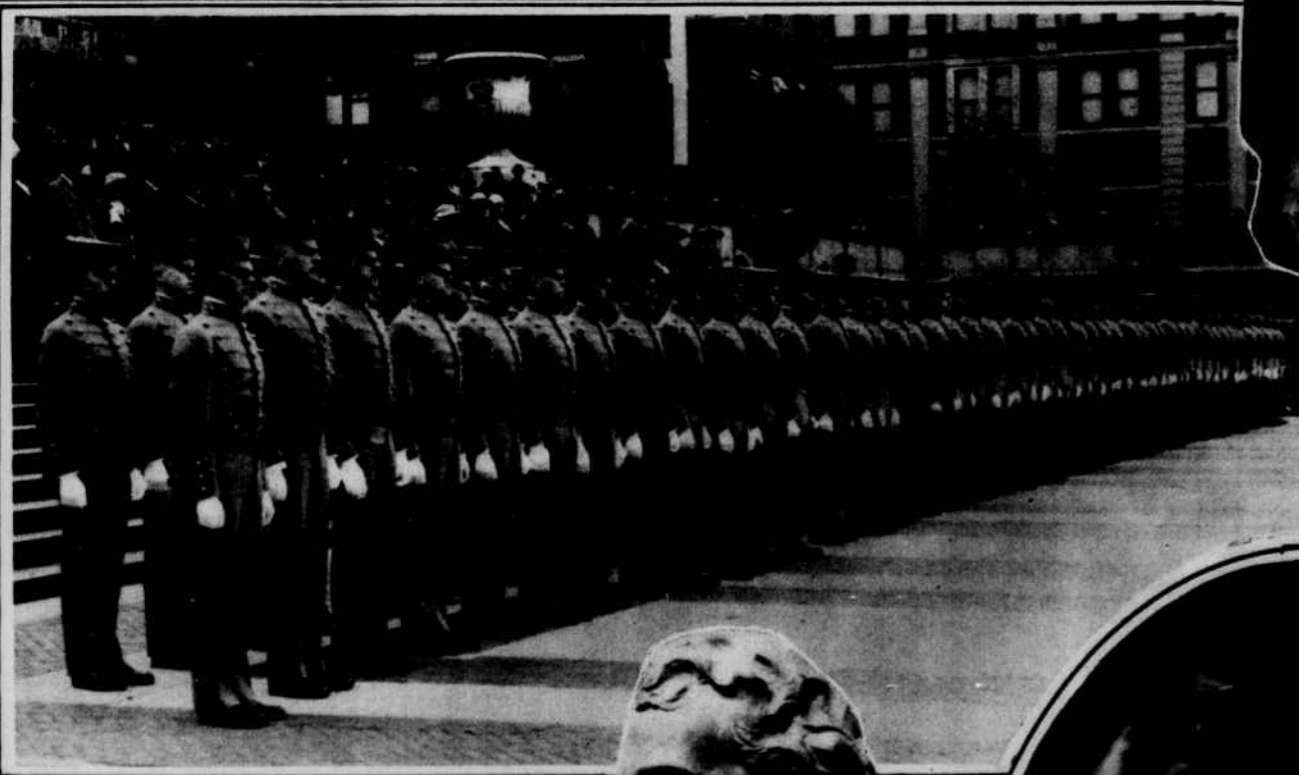

Former Ambassador James W. Gerard, Countess Harriet Daly Sigary and, at right, Mrs. Gerard just after they boarded the Mauretania to sail for Europe.

Is he or not a deckhand? Enrico Caruso, Jr., son of the late Metropolitan star, aboard the liner Providence on his way to Europe. Ship passengers were astonished when they learned this young member of the deck crew was the son of the tenor. He refused to explain why he was working his way. Underwood & Underwood.

Just as delightful as ever—Miss Billie Burke in "The Intimate Strangers," her latest play.

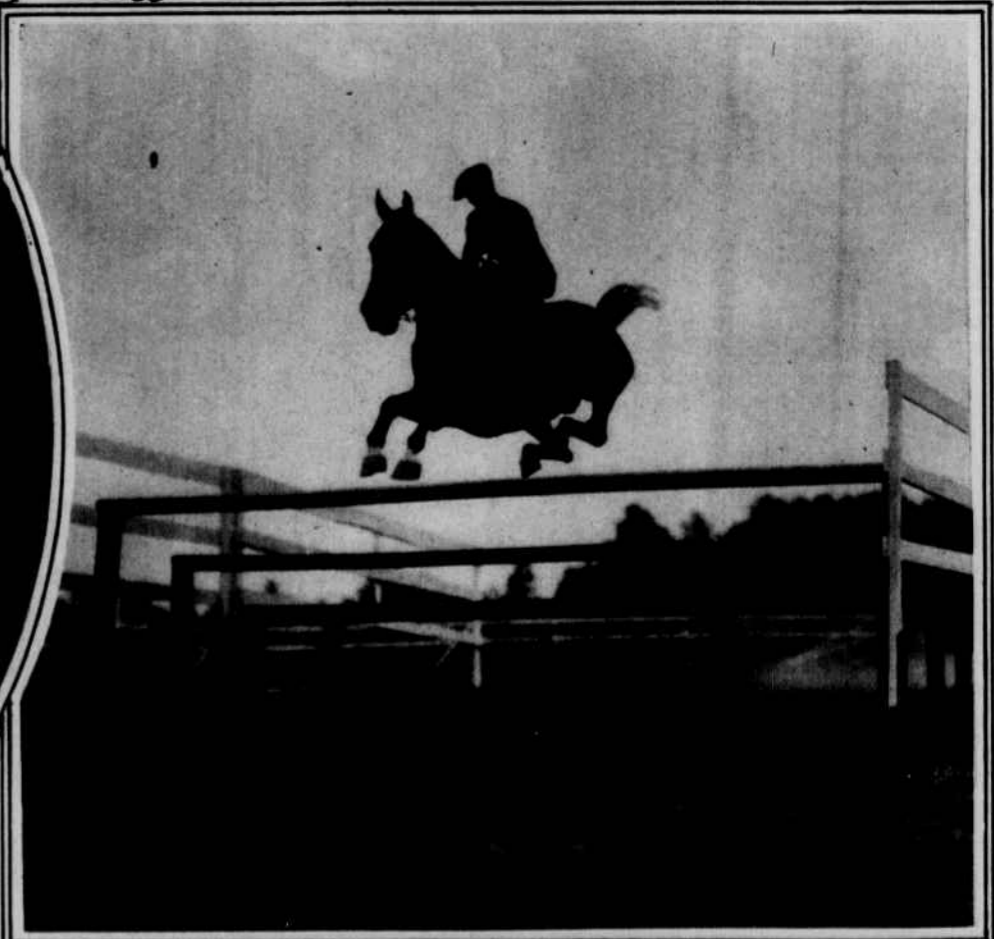

The West Point cadet choir outside the Columbia University library, where they gave an exhibition drill after singing in the chapel. Fotograms.

A bust for the Hall of Fame being completed by one of the nation's foremost sculptors, Daniel French, who has just celebrated his seventy-second birthday. The subject is Edgar Allan Poe and will be unveiled May 20. Keystone.

"The third generation." Miss Helen Le Seure, granddaughter of Congressman Cannon. She is visiting her distinguished relative in Washington and is being extensively entertained. She resembles "Uncle Joe" more than any of his grandchildren. (c) Clinecast.

At the Pinehurst Horse Show. Adjutant, owned by Mrs. Leo F. F. Warner, going over the triple bar jump, the most difficult and interesting feature of this annual exhibition.